From the Author
Gardening is a passion with us, letting us feel a deep connection with the soil and a kinship with workers-of-the-earth everywhere. Hawaiian gardeners are no exception. Polynesians for generations have planted and harvested in season, knowing the purpose of every plant they tended. Seasonally, the flowering of plants in the tropics is dependant upon climatic and geographical variations, even from island to island. Each time we visit, certain plants are in flower while others have bloom time yet to come. This book is a compilation of photographs and information we have gathered from our experience of hosting tours through the gardens. Going to the Hawaiian Islands, especially in the late winter of Minnesota, we find every trip filled with memories found in the exuberance of the gardens, in the excitement of the wonderful people who travel with us, and the gracious Islanders who make us feel like 'ohana (family).
